Correspondent Mike Leonard Traces His Roots in Ireland

JANE PAULEY (anchor): President Reagan leaves tomorrow on a trip that many Americans have made, back to Ireland to look for the places the family once called home. On his Cross Country this morning, Mike Leonard takes us on a similar voyage of rediscovery that he made recently.

MIKE LEONARD (reporting): In the Dublin National Library, it starts with just a name in a book, and from there the anticipation builds. What should I expect to see?

Unidentified man: About your family? They expected that they were just human beings and they lived a hard life.

MIKE LEONARD: In the ensuing search, counties were narrowed to cities, then to town lands and to parishes. An old priest goes back a century to find the handwritten registration of a baptism. And then I find…Hi, Martin Leonard?

MARTIN LEONARD: Hello.

MIKE LEONARD: I’m Mike Leonard.

MARTIN LEONARD: Hi son, how are you?

MIKE LEONARD: How are you? My father’s first cousin, with a son my age, pictures, and a grandfather’s birthplace. Two hundred miles away, the family tree bends in another direction, around faces young and old, to a cemetery overgrown, and back to the rocky field, the abandoned houses and the old man left behind with the bittersweet memories of a family’s and a nation’s flight, for Today, Mike Leonard, NBC News, Newcastle, County Sligo, Ireland.
